

Sy Stokes is currently a Graduate Research Associate for the USC Race & Equity Center, and a second year Ph.D. student in the Urban Education Policy program at USC's Rossier School of Education. His primary research is focused on racism on college campuses during the Trump presidency. He graduated from UCLA with a B.A. in African American Studies, and earned his Master's Degree in Higher Education at the University of Pennsylvania. For the past five years, he has travelled the nation performing his spoken word poetry that touches on various topics including social justice, student activism, race and racism, education, love, family, and mental health. In addition to his creative repertoire, he also facilitates race and equity trainings for administrators and staff working in professional organizations, colleges and universities, and local school districts. He also has four cats: one named Steph, one named Curry, one named Speedy Claxton, and one named Ros Gold-Onwude.
